Excerpt: . . . fisheries in the 1990s because, as will be shown, the two fleets fished in slightly different regions. Hauls in which Atka mackerel was targeted were identified in the observer database using the species composition of the catch samples and a series of hierarchical target definitions (J. Berger, NMFS, Alaska Fisheries Science Center, 7600 Sand Point Way, NE, Seattle, WA 98115. Personal commun. , March 1992). Atka mackerel was assumed to be a target species if it made Hauls in which other species comprised up at least 20 of the retained groundfish by weight. between 20 and 95 of the retained groundfish were removed from consideration prior to assigning an Atka mackerel target to those satisfying the above criterion. Depth, location and date of the Atka mackerel fishery hauls were utilized to analyze seasonal and depth distributions of the exploited populations by area (Table 1...
